第一篇：

Eleven-year-old Hayliee Tat traveled over two hours with her family for a sneak preview of what the future looks like with robots in it. Their destination is the Robotics Open House at the University of Southern California (USC).

The yearly events draw elementary and secondary school students from Los Angeles 31 to spark their interest in robotics and computer science.

“Not many girls and kids are in robotics,” said Tat, who was introduced to robotics when a friend invited her to join a team that builds robots and competes with other teams through tasks the machines can perform. Tat, however, is in the 32.

The National Center for Education Statistics found that in 2015, less than 18 percent of female college graduates in the U.S. earned a computer science degree. USC is trying to overwhelm young people to robotics and computer science through the open house, where students can tour the research labs. The aim is to make robotics exciting and relevant 33 students will want to learn how to code.

“Coding is like the necessary second language that everybody, especially this generation, is going to need,” said Katie Mills, manager of the Robotics Open House. “There are fewer people, especially women, 34 in computer science in college now than there were 30 years ago. And there are so many jobs.”

USC works with local schools, their teachers, and students to try to fill this 35. They hope to attract more students, especially girls, to pursue computer science in college.
